Production of an antigenic hepatitis B surface antigen peptide expressed in rice seeds. Hepatitis B surface antigen (HBsAg), the major antigen of the HBV vaccine, is composed of three major polypeptides, core, polymerase, and surface, and a novel HBsAg has been obtained by the peptide that reacts to the monoclonal antibody to HBsAg. However, no one has provided a feasible large-scale production system of this antigen. To produce the HBsAg peptide antigenically equivalent to the HBsAg using a plant seed production system, we developed a fusion protein expression system in which the HBsAg peptide gene is fused to the signal peptide of rice alpha-amylase for secretion into and transportation into seeds. This fusion protein was expressed in tobacco leaves and rice seeds. Immunoblot analysis revealed that the fusion protein was secreted from tobacco leaves and accumulated in rice seeds. The target peptide was also detected in the rice seed extracts by ELISA. In addition, the fusion protein was recognized by the monoclonal antibody to HBsAg by immunoblotting. These results demonstrated the possibility of using a plant seed production system to obtain an antigenic equivalent of the HBsAg in which the peptide domain reacting to the monoclonal antibody to HBsAg is contained.// Module included in the following assemblies: // // * networking/workload-isolated/using-aws-vpc/using-isolation-with-aws-vpc.adoc // * networking/workload-isolated/using-aws-vpc/using-isolation-with-aws-vpc.original.adoc // * networking/workload-isolated/using-aws-vpc/using-isolation-with-aws-vpc.protocol-versions.adoc // * networking/workload-isol
