While the client is a pretty nice touch-enabled interface, there's still some room for improvement. Today AOL released the first beta of the new client. As always, if you'd like to try it out, AOL is hosting a free 30-day trial of the new version. It's a good chance for those who aren't comfortable with running a beta program to try it out. AOL Desktop Client for Windows 6.8.50298.8 Beta The new AOL client does a few interesting things right off the bat. It offers a set of shortcut buttons that let you launch your favorite services, such as IM, Mail, News, etc. The new version is also compatible with the MMCSS media library, which simplifies the display of your media files. The new AOL client isn't entirely new. It's largely been for people on the Windows Mobile platform, which is AOL's browser and portal for viewing content. One of the biggest complaints about the previous AOL client was the lack of Flash support. Thankfully, the new client has got that going for it. AOL is one of many sites that provide a version of Flash that doesn't require any plugins.

The new client also updates the kind of content. Like many sites these days, AOL is emphasizing its content-driven site by offering more video. The new client also adds an RSS feed reader so you can start reading blogs, for example. It's not a huge amount, but it's a small thing that could help attract new users. Another change is the customization of your desktop and Start menu. Many AOL users complained about the previous client not providing a customized desktop or Start menu. The new client removes the standard Start screen, going with a grid of links to personalized tiles. Here, you can keep track of your messages, news, and IM accounts all in one place. It's a pretty nice touch. Another change is to the typing experience. The new client eliminates the fuzzy text that previous versions exhibited. Instead, you'll type your messages in a clean and crisp text interface.

It's a nice touch. Other changes include the replacement of the previous service links with a widgetized 09e8f5149f
