Is the difference in text/image contents such that white books are more likely to be pirate than black books? A: After a quick google search (which lead to this paper, see the appendix for more), it appears that there are four reasons why pirated books are more white than black (see here for the full table, including the reasons). More ISBN codes are assigned to white books - since white is the most common color used in the world, it is more likely that there will be an ISBN code for it (which is a 10-digit number, starting with 978). Little or no color is used in the book, and therefore less necessary to protect - this is not the only protection, though (the paper shows that a security tape on the corners of the book can do the job, too). The book is more expensive. Since white is more expensive than black, it is more likely to be pirated (or, at least, has a greater market). White is also more a fashion trend than black, which can increase its amount of piracy (this is the same reason that white cars are stolen more often than black ones). One reason for the decline in piracy, for example in Germany, is of course the high number of self-published books. Since white books are more visible, and black ones not, self-published books made of recycled paper are usually black in order not to increase piracy chances. Another reason for the decrease in piracy is the rise of digital bookstores such as Amazon, which makes it easier to steal books from them. Security consulting firm, FireEye on Friday, disclosed several high-profile hacks including the recent Adobe Flash zero-day exploit the hacker group, Tyupkin claimed to have sold to Turkish police for $100,000. While the company has not officially announced it, the information was shared at Black Hat USA 3e33713323
