in Argentina and an amount of available memory. it may seem like a perfect match, but initial performance tests indicate that the new Arduino Mega 2560 is faster than the Arduino Due. Adventures in Voltage Much of the hardware on the board is driven by 3.3V logic levels, while the other parts are driven by 5V. A voltage divider was constructed to allow the board to use a single 5V power supply. This meant that all analog pins could be used without an external voltage converter. One of the items that didn't show well on the teardown was the regulator that supplies a stable 3.3V out the board. Upon closer inspection, the voltage regulator used is the ubiquitous TPS61386 which is known for its excellent noise immunity. This was confirmed by running the same regular pulses over three different power supplies, and the Teardown Board was able to operate consistently at the same 3.3V voltage. So, while the voltage is not quite as stable as some of the other boards, it is still very good. However, as mentioned above, over time this voltage can fluctuate under load. So the board is capable of running the many sensors and other hardware on the board. A 5V supply will work as well, and power the 3.3V logic pins, but a large spread in the supply voltage could reduce the reliability of the board. Since the board is running a single microcontroller, it will require a static power source. In our case, that was the USB port on the computer. So we need an efficient power 3e33713323
