The increasingly serious inability of the NHS to recruit more doctors has grown into a crisis after a decade of stagnation and a fall in the number of medical school places and bursaries. As a result, doctors are leaving the NHS and increasing numbers of patients are being forced to wait for appointments. The NHS pay talks are taking place amid a backdrop of growing concern about a doctors' recruitment crisis and growing criticism of NHS pay. A leaked document, seen by the Guardian, revealed a two-tier pay model with a vast difference in the starting salaries for doctors graduating today compared to those who will graduate in the next decade. It also suggested an increasingly wide pay gap between doctors of different seniority and between those training in different specialities. Many junior doctors who have previously contributed to health professionals' organisations (HPSOs) are concerned their experiences of working conditions in the NHS are being omitted from NHS pay negotiations, due to a lack of representation. One junior doctor described the NHS pay negotiations as "a start to finish mess" as there was no consideration of the effect on recruitment.
