That franchise relocated to Oklahoma City in 2008, in part because of the declining financial future of the Seattle market. The Sonics were never a huge franchise. The team played in the city that gave it birth, Seattle, for over three decades, and they won three division titles. They even had two champions in the East, the early '90s teams that lost to Michael Jordan's Bulls. The Sonics' fans, the team's media, and the city of Seattle will always feel a special bond with the team. The first Sonics were also the first team to play in Seattle. This was an early 1980s team, at first sponsored by the short-lived Carling Brewing Company. The team, which was also the first to play in a modern-era NBA arena, the Seattle Center Coliseum, folded at the end of the 1983-84 season. The next team, the 1987-88 Seattle Supersonics, failed to sustain success either. The team was co-owned by the Portland Trail Blazers, who had kept it going in its original Seattle incarnation, and the Seattle Supersonics. The new team moved to Washington in 1988, where it was considered a Pacific Division team. It played its home games at the Kingdome, now Washington's easternmost venue. No team won more games than the Seattle Supersonics, winning 124. The western Pacific Division was won by the Los Angeles Lakers, who hadn't lost at home since Nov. 22, 1978, when they were playing the Detroit Pistons. Seattle won the Pacific Division again in 1989, but lost to the Lakers in the Western Conference finals. With the elimination of Portland after the 1991-92 season, the Supersonics became the Trail Blazers. A few months after the Portland Trail Blazers left Seattle, the team that had been called the Seattle Supersonics was reborn. The Sup
