SquidCube [Mac/Win]

The main advantage of SquidCube is that it is based on Gnu-Perl and it's a small program (5 Mb). This means that it can be used to parse huge log files (in our case, 400 Mb of logs). SquidCube can generate SQL statements to store the aggregates in PostgreSQL databases. The aggregates are stored as tables (with extensions). SquidCube Installation: You can install SquidCube in a Linux machine using only Python. The PyPy package (that is, using only Python without the need of CPython) will be used. First, install Python and the PyPy package from the distribution repositories (Ubuntu 10.04 LTS) : sudo apt-get install python-pypy3 python-dev libpypy-dev Check that you have those packages by installing SquidgetCube : sudo apt-get install python-squidcube To install the PyPy package from the PyPy site : sudo wget sudo tar xvjf pypy3-3.3.0.tar.bz2 cd pypy3-3.3.0 sudo python setup.py install Now, SquidCube is ready to be used. SquidCube Usage: Now that SquidCube is installed, we can start using it. Start SquidCube from your preferred terminal : squidcube [options] squidcube [options] [fileout] squidcube is the command that processes the logs. When it is used, SquidCube creates a SQLite database and writes the aggregates (for each partition) in that database. The aggregates and partitions can be saved to a CSV file with the fileout option. Here are the options that can be used : --help – show this help --version – show SquidCube version --destdir – changes SquidCube destination directory --no-db-path – change SquidCube directory --database-prefix – change SquidCube database name For example, we can use the
