Photoshop CC 2015 Version 17

Tasting Matron: "Ya gotta have some liquid." Probably the most enterprising of all the poison business -- and notorious for making counterfeiters rich -- is the whiskey, which is a narcotic more powerful than opium. When a German importer began selling whiskey to the Spanish Government, and the American Government became suspicious that English whiskey was being passed off as American, Congress passed a law to prohibit smuggling of intoxicants into the United States. Fortunately for smugglers, whiskey is more easily "passed" than wine or brandy. A genuine bourbon, with all the proof it warrants, looks just like an American whiskey. But in other cases the whiskey may have been very good whiskey, but so far gone through redistillation that it had lost all the characteristics of genuine bourbon. This may or may not have been distilled with pure charred oak, using only the best charred peat-oak barrels, and producing just enough alcohol to disguise the adulteration. Many celebrated whiskey merchants, recognizing the possibilities of the market, have made an art of adulteration. The earlier we are in whiskey drinking and the poorer we are, the more a whiskey is used, the more we have to pay for it, and the less it can be had for, and the more it is demanded. Drunkenness is a spending disease. The most notorious and widespread variety of poison is the methanol, which, when present in whiskey or medicines is colorless, odorless, tasteless, and indistinguishable from a harmless beverage or medicine. And since it is an alcohol, when properly used, it is a more satisfactory and safe stimulant than any available, unless you have been exposed to, or injected, with strychnine. No one can overdose on methanol, but one can on strychnine. Its amount of force, in fatal doses, is not stated, but $30,000 was paid out on a charge of murder in New York on the basis of a statement that a bottle of whiskey contained 0.38% of methanol. The proof of this rumour was that the victim had tried to take the bottle from his wife, and had been cut on the side of the wrist by a broken glass. The bottle of whiskey was admitted to be a cheap counterfeit, but the methanol was not. Since whiskey is the most popular intoxicant, because of the world's poverty, and the cheapest, the victim is probably the poor and, in addition
