English football, soccer, football, futbol, fif...A mutation in the HFE gene causes hereditary hemochromatosis. Iron is an essential element for many vital functions, but the homeostasis of iron is a delicate balance. An inherited disorder of iron metabolism, hereditary hemochromatosis, is characterized by an inappropriate increase of iron absorption and storage. A key enzyme of iron homeostasis, transferrin receptor 1 (TfR1), is required for the uptake of iron by most cells. The human transferrin receptor 2 (TfR2) has recently been identified, and it is unlikely to function in iron uptake. TfR1 is a heterodimeric glycoprotein which consists of the mature domain and a common amino-terminal peptide (CAP) that is shared by many transmembrane proteins, including the transferrin receptor. We found that a single base change in the HFE gene, causing a Cys-->Arg change at amino acid 280, is present in three families with haemochromatosis and in a majority of patients with hereditary haemochromatosis in China. The highly conserved amino acid Arg-280 is present in most animal transferrin receptors and is a strong candidate for the activation of the peptide. Our results suggest that the hereditary haemochromatosis phenotype in Chinese patients is caused by a point mutation in the TfR1 gene.Q: Will the accepted answer be visible only to the person who asked the question? If I receive an answer to one of my questions and later decide it is not the correct answer, then will the person who posted the correct answer not see the accepted answer? A: Yes, the user will not see any of your accepted answers. They only see the user who posted the accepted answer. If you are having problems accepting an answer, then you can see this section on meta. A: If you have your own answer you should accept that one, as it is the right answer in your opinion. If you don't have your own answer yet, then you
