These modes enable you to create different looks on top of one another or to soften contrast and contrast detail. Illustration 2-3 shows how you can play around with the blending modes of one of your layers to see what they do to your image. Illustration 2-3: The blending modes for each layer control the interaction between layers to show different styles. Correcting Color Problems When images are captured with the wrong settings, some of the colors in them can be too dark or too light. You can play around with the Curves Adjustment Layer (also called an adjustment layer) to adjust the colors in your images, and depending on what settings you have, you can also use the Colors panel to correct the colors in your image. Reducing color saturation When images are taken with the wrong settings, a portion of the colors can be too bright, too dark, or too saturated. You can reduce this color saturation to make a photo look more natural by using one of the camera setting adjustment layers. You can use the Curves Adjustment Layer (also known as an adjustment layer) to reduce the color saturation in an image. To use it, first open the image you want to adjust and choose Select⇒Modify⇒Adjust Color Settings. Then, in the color settings dialog box, either use the colors in the image or choose the Colorize option to use the target color as the base color. Check out Figure 2-4. FIGURE 2-4: The Curves Adjustment Layer lets you change the saturation of colors in an image. As you make color changes, the current image is updated in the adjustment layer above. The Curves Adjustment Layer enables you to adjust colors in a way that works specifically for the image you're working on. The technique of using a Curves Adjustment Layer works in many image-editing software programs, such as GIMP and Photoshop.
