In the field of information storage devices, several techniques have been proposed which use a cutting tool and a rotating cutting disk to store information in areas of the disk defined by paths in the disk. The general idea behind such techniques is to store information by cutting grooves, holes, or other lines in a surface of the disk. A pattern of information (e.g., stored as grooves in the disk) is thus created. One such proposal is described in U.S. Pat. No. 4,945,507, which is incorporated herein by reference in its entirety. The '507 patent proposes a technique for cutting a series of concentric circles into a spinning blank. The circles are cut near an outer rim of the disk, and define tracks, which can store information. A probe is used to contact a series of concentric tracks on the disk, in order to store information in the disk as grooves. As the disk rotates, a scanning probe contacts the disk in order to read and store information. When the scanning probe contacts the disk, data is read from the disk, as well as transmitted back to the probe. The reading and storage of the information is performed by a feedback loop. The probe is used to read information from the disk, and to move the probe within the disk to a new location so as to create the next track in the series. By establishing a feedback loop, the probe can move to a new location in the disk, as well as read and store information. Unfortunately, the feedback loop may be difficult to implement and control. Another proposal, which is described in U.S. Pat. No. 4,761,544, is also incorporated herein by reference in its entirety. The '544 patent describes another technique for cutting a series of concentric circles into a spinning blank. The circles are cut near an outer rim of the disk, and define tracks, which can store information. Another patent describing cutting concentric circles in a rotating disk is U.S. Pat. No. 5,001,871, which is also incorporated herein by reference in its entirety. This patent describes techniques for cutting the concentric circles in a spinning disk. The technique involves creating an initial reference center for the concentric circles, prior to cutting the circles into the disk. This reference center is located on the axis of rotation of the disk, and includes a radially extending, continuously rounded edge. 3e33713323
