Storage units come in two kinds: permanent storage where your units are never going to change, and short term or term storage where your price is higher than other companies, but you get your units back when you're done. Ask about their "first-in, last-out" policy. If you plan on housing your dog for a long period of time, a permanent unit may work for you. However, if you just want your dog to stay somewhere for a few weeks and then move into another house with another dog, you'll have to rent a short-term unit. All units should have clean, safe, and well-ventilated areas where your dog stays. Check the bedding and carpet for signs of moisture, pet hair, and urine stains. Ask if there is air-conditioning in the unit and how it affects the temperature. If your dog needs to stay cool or warm, be sure to pay special attention to that when you rent your unit. Ask if pets are allowed to visit your unit. Dogs must be on a leash in public places. If it's your first time renting, try to ask if there is a pet deposit, and if so, what it is. Make sure the provider has an updated health certificate from your veterinarian for each dog in your family. Check the details and dates of the certificates on the renter's application. Make sure your coverage starts at least seven days before you plan to take your dog out of the unit. You should be able to find references from previous renters. Check if it's a business or an individual, and contact them. Always review the agreement or rental contract carefully before renting a storage unit.
