The image is not entirely focused as the preview area should be, the same goes to the cloud download page. It seems to me that this might be a recurring bug, even the new version of Windows does not work correctly on my computer either. Could you clarify for me what exactly is the problem, and if there is any solution? A: Well I've found out that the issue with this page is actually done from the official Adobe website. The Adobe's download page changed and now shows you the screen that appears at the download page: According to this it now also has the CS6 Trial. This means that the old version of the page is actually the old version of CS6 Trial. I guess the missing page that they used to have is now removed and is part of the new download page for the CS6 Trial.

Recovery from implicit change blindness induced by simulating naked-eye vision. Naked-eye vision is limited to species that are highly adapted for underground life. Animate objects tend to be harder to detect than inanimate objects in natural habitats, and insects in particular tend to avoid being caught when there are trees or bushes nearby because they do not see well in dim light and there is no need to see the immediate surroundings to avoid running into obstacles. When trees are absent, however, most primates and even cats can successfully detect objects lying on the ground. Humans are probably the most successful animals when it comes to seeing predators under these circumstances, because we have the most developed (naked-eye) visual system and have become long-sighted through evolution. We habitually walk around while looking up at the sky and standing upright to see many objects in our surroundings, but if we do this in a shopping mall or in a graveyard, we would fail to notice most of them. Although these visual systems have evolved to respond very well to motion and low-contrast fine detail, they are not well adapted to recognise the lower surface of a leaf or the difference between a rotting corpse and a resting cat. Consequently, these visual systems can be easily tricked by images that are similar to a real scene, even when there is a great distance between the subject and the source of the input stimuli. To be able to recognise the true identity of the stimuli, we need to acquire knowledge about the relevant background context, which is easily lost if the context changes quickly. To address the importance of contextual information for recognizing objects and to investigate the brain's response to changes in
