Prevalence of symptoms and sleep impairment in people with bulimia nervosa. A group of subjects with a DSM-IV diagnosis of bulimia nervosa, as ascertained using a semistructured interview, and a group of age-and sex-matched healthy controls were compared on a range of measures. The groups were generally similar with regard to sociodemographic and eating disorder characteristics. However, the subjects with bulimia nervosa reported a substantially higher frequency of general health complaints than the control subjects, including significantly higher ratings for sleep problems and greater discomfort with passing wind. The subjects with bulimia nervosa also reported significantly higher rates of episodes of depression and negative affect than the controls. These findings represent a significant contribution to the literature and may offer a further basis for the empirical distinction between a bulimic subtype of anorexia nervosa and other subtypes of eating disorders. Studies of modified DNA in particles of nuclei isolated from cultured cells by the procedure of SDS isolation and density gradient centrifugation. A technique has been developed for isolating nuclei and then separating them from their cytoplasm. Nuclei are isolated from trypsin-treated cells, and the nuclei are pelleted by centrifugation in a sucrose density gradient. The preparation of this gradient consists of two sequential steps. After nuclei are isolated by centrifugation, the particles containing the nuclei are absorbed onto the bottom of a plastic tube and further centrifuged. Fractionated, purified nuclei are then washed in a graded sucrose density buffer and again re-absorbed onto the plastic tube bottom. The purified nuclear suspension is aspirated from the tube and re-applied to the sucrose density gradient. This technique has been used to examine the purity and quantity of endogenous DNA which is associated with the pelleted nuclei. The quantity of DNA per nuclear particle is approximately 100 micrograms, which is about 10-fold lower than reported for isolated nuclei.

Every Android tutorial seems to use the RecyclerView.Adapter class, but in what way is it superior to just using a simple RecyclerView.ViewHolder? I understand that RecyclerView.Adapter is better in terms of creating and managing complex data sets, but the RecyclerView.ViewHolder is
