The Raise the Wage Act, which passed both the House and Senate last month with a veto-proof majority, would raise the minimum wage for workers at the federal contract-level from the current rate of $7.25 to $10.10 an hour, which is currently far below the federal minimum wage of $7.25 an hour. ADVERTISEMENT "This will bring wages of our workforce in line with the skyrocketing cost of living," said Rep. Gerry Connolly Gerald (Gerry) Edward Connolly Judge issues nationwide injunction against Postal Service changes House panel advances bill to ban Postal Service leaders from holding political positions Shakespeare Theatre Company goes virtual for 'Will on the Hill...or Won't They?' MORE (D-Va.), chairman of the House committee that held a hearing about the minimum wage for federal contract workers in April. The bill will be signed in a ceremony at the White House on Thursday with some of the lowest-paid federal contractors in attendance. The legislation also provides more flexibility to states to set their own minimum wage rates, currently, 29 states and the District of Columbia have their own minimum wage levels, while 17 do not. The bill says that these 29 states "may set a minimum wage that is higher or lower than the national minimum wage level set pursuant to this section and the national minimum wage level set pursuant to this section shall apply only to employees of a contractor covered by a contract between the contractor and the United States that is executed on or after the date of the enactment of this subsection." But the minimum wage of $10.10 for federal contract workers will still apply. Connolly's committee also held a hearing in September about the living wage for federal contract workers. The Raise the Wage Act would raise the current minimum wage for federal contract workers to $10.10 on Jan. 1, 2019, and $11.10 one year later. "The law will take effect in the 1,000 contracts covered, but federal officials have pledged to examine the economic impact on the federal contractors," said Connolly's statement. "These standards will be an important benchmark, but we need to be mindful of the options that

Q: How to log the model state before calling something that updates the model I have an application that has a pretty involved viewmodel. I want to be able to log the model state before and after it is updated, but I don't see a nice way to do this without adding a public method onto the viewmodel that logs things. It seems like I should be able to do this with a breakpoint, but I am new to using Xamarin. What is the best way to do this? I have the feeling that I am missing some simple way, but Xamarin isn't letting me think correctly today. A: A simple one liner in the log statement should get you the output you want for every object that gets updated in your VM. Just add a breakpoint to your various methods that perform updates to the model, then check the value of each object before and after the update. The code could look something like this var _logger = DependencyService.Get(); public void TheCrazyUpdateMethod() { var entry = this.Object.Current; var entry2 = this.Object2.Current; _logger.LogMessage("Before update: Entry {0}, Entry2 {1}", entry, entry2); this.Object.Current = new Object() { EntryNumber = 1 }; this.Object2.Current = new Object() { EntryNumber = 2 }; _logger.LogMessage("After update: Entry {0}, Entry2 {1}", entry, entry2); }

In the last decade, the construction industry and the home building industry have attempted to integrate the plumbing fixture industry into the home construction industry. A leading example of this integration is the Kohler&Struxks "Integra" system, which couples the plumbing fixture industry with the home building industry. More recently, the plumbing fixture industry has attempted to integrate the plumbing fixture industry into the home building industry by providing a two-piece construction system in which one component is a prefabricated, metal stud frame member and the other component is a prefabricated trim member. Unfortunately, attempts to integrate the plumbing fixture industry into the home building industry in these ways have not been successful, and thus the need exists for a plumbing fixture system
