The kinematic distribution of [α -rich stars]{} in the thick disc also suggests that it is the oldest component. The combination of a relatively large spread of orbital angles and a long diffuse tail in the velocity distribution indicates that it is a very large, fairly old and slowly rotating structure, reminiscent of what has been identified as the “cosmic sheet” [@bakos+02; @bakos+03; @moore+03; @ibata+04; @martinez-delgado+05]. If one assumes that the thick disc is the present day remnant of a large merger event, this would be consistent with the timescale identified in Sect. \[sec:data\], assuming that the merger event happened $\sim 3-4$ Gyr ago. The large spread in orbital angles of [α -rich stars]{} also suggests that the [α -rich stars]{} have been strongly affected by the merger process, perhaps in the global sense that it has made the disc thick and long and possibly also in the sense that the merger process has lead to the formation of a rather peculiar class of stars. The merger event could have involved any of the minor partners of the Milky Way, including the IAU Andromeda dwarf galaxy, which would fit in well with the global scenario that was proposed by @kirby+08. The important result of this work is that the thick disc is the true site where the origin of carbon-enhancement in metal-poor stars is to be sought. New detailed studies of carbon-enhanced metal-poor stars within the thin and the thick discs will provide additional constraints on the merger scenario described above, which appear to be in agreement with the results of @fontaine+08
