The molecular-targeted therapy with tyrosine kinase inhibitors has significantly improved outcome of patients with acute myeloid leukemia (AML). It is assumed that long-term survivors of AML may experience disease-related quality of life (QOL) dysfunction, but the precise impact of tyrosine kinase inhibitors (TKIs) on QOL remains unknown. The aim of this study was to clarify QOL of patients with AML treated with cytarabine. We analyzed QOL of patients with AML undergoing induction chemotherapy for the first time with or without cytarabine and TKIs. Patients completed European Organization for Research and Treatment of Cancer Quality of Life Core 30 questionnaire before and after first cycle of cytarabine. Patients with AML treated with TKIs, achieved statistically significantly higher mean overall QOL (P = 0.02), emotional (P = 0.05), and social (P = 0.06) functioning scores, and lower symptom scores (P = 0.04) than patients without TKIs. Conversely, the median overall QOL scores of patients treated with TKIs were not statistically different from
