"We've been closely watching the movement patterns of some of the top footballers in the world and saw a real opportunity to take a more player-centric approach to gameplay," said Alex Williams, senior gameplay designer, FIFA. "HyperMotion Technology captures the subtleties of movement on and off the pitch that other motion capture systems can't replicate, as well as providing performance data for all 22 players, so we can continue to fine-tune the match engine." HyperMotion Technology adds more control and freedom to how players interact with the pitch, ball and each other. Grounded in patterns of highly accurate and repeatable movement, players respond to each other in more natural ways than ever before. Tackles now follow the natural flow of the body, while the ball deflected off a player's foot will spring back to its original position. "That's the direction we want football to move in. Now players and coaches can make real-time decisions on where they want their players to move, how they want them to move," said Williams. "This technology is going to make the flow of the game a lot more spontaneous than ever before, and it's going to be a real challenge for players to adapt, from the very start.” Developers have also added more damage to the game’s player collisions and more responsive penalty kicks to ensure a more realistic and action-packed match experience. Additionally, the new “active player” system helps make real-time decisions easier for players, coaches and referees. “We listened to what players said they wanted in FIFA 17,” said Gary Hocking, executive vice president, Electronic Arts. “We're able to refine the game's physics with the most precise motion capture data from professional players and video analysis to deliver on the three wishes of realism, creativity and change to an amazing football experience.” New improvements to how and where players can score goals also aid the game's authenticity.

“We wanted to give both teams the ability to score from anywhere and any angle,” said Williams. “Now defenders can be left on an island and players can be left with one foot in. They can open up space and make more powerful, creative runs in the final third.” HyperMotion Technology unlocks new gameplay tactics while delivering a more immersive football experience. New and familiar gameplay mechanics have also been improved with a brand

Features Key:

- Brand new game engine, AI Director 2.0.
- Strong emphasis on creating a deeper and more realistic soccer experience based on a vast amount of motion capturing and physical teaching data collected from real-life players.
- New Career Mode that gives players more options and a deeper management experience.
- Several new features for Ultimate Team Mode including Creator Draft, Customisation > Customise the look of your team (players, managers, kit, stadium) and choose your preferred 4-3-3-2 formation.
- Return of the Player Impact Engine — a new way for players to intelligently react to situations on the pitch. Player Impact on Face of Players — every time a player makes a successful pass, a face of the recipient is added, showing his reaction.
- Dynamic and Responsive Pivots — the ball will turn more freely when the ball and the player are on different axes.
- The ball responds sensitively to your acceleration, rotation or handling technique — in every situation the ball will react naturally.
