In this blog I will explain how the technology works from the perspective of the player and how it has been implemented in FIFA 22. The Player Perspective The key point to consider is that every player, in real life, is equipped with at least one sensor. The sensors that you use are typically placed in different locations on your body. For example, a player's right foot is equipped with a sensor that allows the players to detect when they touch the ball. This information is used to display the player's touches on the pitch and determine his position on the pitch. Likewise, a player's head or body is typically equipped with sensors that capture the movement of his arms, legs and torso during a match. The sensors from this array of motion capture devices are compared to a database of player movements. Once a match has completed, we are now able to review and understand the movements of the 22 players on the pitch simultaneously. The required time to process data from 22 players is now scalable. This means that the more sensors we have, the faster the analysis can occur. The players' locations on the pitch are visible in the game, so the developers can build different actions and movements around these locations. For example, the striker's space in the penalty area can be compared to his teammates and opponents. All of this information is available to designers, as they seek to build engaging gameplay and progression systems. The Result So, in FIFA 22, we can now understand the movements and characteristics of the 22 players and their respective playing styles. Accordingly, we can now drive the game dynamics around specific players, in a more targeted and authentic manner. The technology also enables a better understanding of player characteristics in the context of the pitch. For example, we can now understand the movement characteristics of the elite "X" player in possession, who occupies a premium location on the pitch. By applying this understanding of player characteristics, the designers can then put into place smarter tactics, animations, and player interactions. For example, consider a team of 22 players. A midfielder will typically move a lot more than a forward. Also, a 'classic', wide-playmaker will perform different actions than a 'shifty' player who moves into space and around the field. So, by gathering key information about these players, the AI can be better-crafted to understand them. We can also learn from the actions
