Protein-induced DNA-bending using ascorbate-glutathione as a redox couple. The interaction between negatively charged DNA and protein is known to be an essential process in the control of gene transcription. In this article, we report the DNA-bending phenomenon observed when glutathione reacts with ascorbate. The study of the kinetics of the interaction is performed with both circular and linear templates. The unfolded form of glutathione is initially used to activate the ascorbate-glutathione system. The kinetics of this interaction is monitored at different temperatures with circular DNA and shows an exponential decrease of the ratio of circular/linear DNA after the addition of the nucleotide. The study of the circular/linear DNA ratio indicates that the process of DNA-bending is faster for the linear form and is absent or weak for the circular form. These results are consistent with the solvent-exposed nature of the DNA backbone and have been explained by a mechanism of interaction that is dependent on the presence of the negatively charged glutathione.
