A new method for measuring food intake. We designed a method for measuring food intake in humans, using an adjustable current-output bedside device for recording both sleep cycle and movements while sleeping. The amount of energy consumed at night was calculated by subtracting the energy expended at night and during the daytime. The estimation rate of energy intake at night was calculated as a deviation of the quantity of energy consumed at night from the estimated energy expenditure. We studied 10 healthy men (25.8 \pm 3.8 years) who had undergone a 1-month trip to Tokyo. The amount of energy consumed daily during the 1-month trip was $11\,703 \pm 466$ kcal. The amount of energy expended at night was estimated at 9594 ± 442 kcal. The amount of energy required for physical activities for the trip was 7033 ± 701 kcal. The amount of energy intake at night was calculated as 9684 ± 471 kcal. The estimated energy intake rate was $25.7 \pm 3.6\%$. The calculated amount of energy intake at night was not statistically different from the actual energy intake ($P=0.41$). We conclude that the method is clinically suitable for measuring the amount of energy ingested at night using System;

Intraocular pressure changes induced by laser trabeculoplasty in primary open angle glaucoma patients. The purpose of the study was to evaluate the contribution of laser trabeculoplasty to the lowering of intraocular pressure (IOP). The study included 162 eyes of 162 primary open angle glaucoma patients undergoing standard argon laser trabeculoplasty. The mean age was 62.7 +/- 13.5 years with a range from 21 to 85 years. Inclusion criteria included: previous glaucoma surgery history; optic disc cupping with corresponding visual field loss; IOP over 21 mmHg preoperatively; and cup/disc ratio greater than 0.6. IOP measurements were obtained using a slit lamp equipped applanation tonometer prior to laser trabeculoplasty, and at 1 hour and at one, three, and six months after the procedure. IOP was significantly reduced at one hour, one week, one month and three months post-laser trabeculoplasty. The IOP reduction at one week and one month after laser trabeculoplasty was related to the percent of the trabecular meshwork affected and to the preoperative IOP (p The gasket prevents leakage through the valve and the first and
