Using the selection tool In Step 2 in Figure 7-2, you see a partially cropped image of a woman's head. You can see that her hair is lit by a soft light and that her face is fairly dark. You can also see that her nose, eyes, mouth, and ears are outlined in black. FIGURE 7-2: Use the selection tool to select part of the image. You can use the selection tool to select an area of the image that contains one or more areas of interest. The tool may not be the best way to manipulate an image, but it's good for highlighting areas that need some extra attention. To use the selection tool, follow these steps: 1. **Click the Select tab and select the Selection tool in the Tools panel.** 2. **Click the image to place the first point of the selection.** 3. **Drag the mouse to select the areas you want to work with.** 4. **Edit the selection by dragging a box around the areas you want to select or by using the Eraser tool to erase any unwanted selections.** 5. **After you finish working on the selection, choose Edit** ⇒ **Inverse Selection.** Inverse selection reverses your selection by modifying everything that's outside the selection. Often, you use this method to crop unwanted image areas. For example, say that you wanted to remove the ears from your image. You could select the ears, and then click the Crop tool in the Tools panel and click the Crop button on the Crop tool's Options

The multiple option displays the last image you selected as well as the image before that. The Undo/Redo option brings up the History panel at the bottom of the workspace (Figure 3-13). Figure 3-13. To see the changes in your images, use the History panel. In the panel, the Undo button cycles back through the previous versions of the image. Infantile spasms: a retrospective study of factors related to seizure control in 554 children. Long-term seizure control is reported for around one-third of children treated for infantile spasms. To find factors associated with favorable outcome, we reviewed an unselected series of children with infantile spasms treated during a 40-year period. Children with infantile spasms admitted to the authors' hospital during 1964-1992 were identified from the hospital database and from patient records. Pertinent clinical features of the patients and seizure outcomes were analyzed. Of 554 children with infantile spasms, outcome data were available for 531. The median follow-up was 7.4 years. Children who had West syndrome for at least 3 days had a higher chance of long-term control ( $P=0.005$ ), as did children with multiple spasms, infantile spasms not due to hypoxic brain injury, and the two oldest age groups. Among the variables tested, infantile spasms not due to hypoxic injury, presence of transient hypsarrhythmia, and good outcome with treatment were associated with a good long-term outcome, whereas the other variables were not. There was no relation to response to ACTH or chlorpromazine. All children received ACTH and phenobarbital, but 47% of the children received other antiepileptic drugs. Each treatment modality had a different spectrum of predictors of a good outcome. Overall, less than 30% of all children had a good long-term outcome. Infantile spasms represent a heterogeneous group of seizures, with a number of individual features that influence long-term control.
