I did a lot of searching and I can't figure it out. I understand in.js that var is different from non-global var test2 = 'testing stuff from the body'; // this is calling the variable in this context console.log(test2); // but this is a global variable console.log(test1); In my js file I am using two very loose lint style rules like this: /*eslint laxbreak: true, sloppy: true */ if (!this.hScre) { this.hScre = window.document.createElement("canvas") } which I got from a github issue about cross-browser canvas stuff. My questions are: Why is it different? I realize my stylesheets are completely busted. Is there some kind of pattern by which my javascript files get loaded and the.js file contains the variable defined there? Is it that the entire document is just all at once pulled into memory and executed at once before all these.js files are linked in? With that said, if anyone can explain to me why the var keyword works one way in 1.
