A basic and easy to use application, TimeChimes allows you to set up and remember alarms without really becoming quite a stress on your schedule. Cleaning your computer is nothing without an application helping you doing the task, and OneDrive Cleaner has proved to be quite efficient at such a task. Simply install and run the application as you turn on your computer, your antivirus system should detect the program as malicious and alert you if your PC is infected with malware. OneDrive Cleaner Features: After installing OneDrive Cleaner, you might be asked to restart your PC, but it's a small request, and since the purpose of the application is to fix your machine, it won't be a problem at all. Once done, the interface appears, but it's not exactly complete, since it only has a few options. The main options are the Antivirus and Security features, which are also available in the form of two different tabs. First, you can choose the 'Basic' tab which fixes the system while the application is running, ignoring any warning or error messages. The second tab, called 'Advanced', lets you know which actions the program will take if asked to do so by the antivirus. It's rather unnecessary when using the program, as it would only slow down the actions the program is performing. The application isn't very customizable, but it still does perform quite well. OneDrive Cleaner is still a bit of a buggy and unstable application, but it does its work and you shouldn't have any problem using it. I don't know why, but when I open the menu of my computer, the "settings" option is always in the first place... I have no idea why this happens but there is a "manager" option that I can choose, to manage it differently but it simply doesn't work. Many Linux users even use their Linux operating-system as their main operating-system, preferring to boot Windows just to run Windows applications. Linux users who also use the computer for other reasons, such
