It is well known that the masticatory muscles of growing children are functionally immature and have low functional capacities. The aim of the study was to investigate the association of the bite force with mandibular growth and development among children. Bite forces were assessed using the bite force record technique. Cephalometric radiographic analysis was performed and the mandibular dimensions (growth and development) were evaluated. The subjects were 88 children from 8 to 15 years of age. The bite force was measured and it was found that the pattern of bite force applied and the number of occurrences of bites was age-dependent. Bite force, size of the masseter and temporalis muscles and
