Field of the Invention This invention relates to exhaust gas analyzers for a combustion engine, and more particularly to improvements in exhaust gas analyzers for detecting combustion chamber temperatures of an engine used for measuring engine combustion efficiency during vehicle travel. 2. Description of the Prior Art The air/fuel ratio of an engine is a key parameter for its performance and emission control, and the air/fuel ratio control of an engine is effected by monitoring the values of the air and fuel supplied to the engine. In conventional gas/fuel combustion engines, the air/fuel ratio is monitored by measuring the water-vapor concentration in the exhaust gas, but the exhaust gas analyzer of this type is applicable only to engines operating under certain conditions and is not applicable to various other types of engines such as a diesel engine. The above described prior art exhaust gas analyzer and the exhaust gas composition analyzer provided with a water-vapor sensor have no provision for indicating in what phase the engine is during the traveling, and hence cannot ensure proper air/fuel ratio control of the engine. For example, if the engine is in a lean condition in which the exhaust gas is rich, i.e., in which the air/fuel ratio is too low, the combustion efficiency is reduced and a large amount of exhaust gas is generated, and the water-vapor concentration in the exhaust gas is too low. In this case, the air/fuel ratio control will cause the excess air to increase, and hence the mixture in the
