Q: Suitability of ObjectBox for jpa entities? I am considering using objectbox for an entity relationship mapping solution. I have several entities: User which can have a list of profiles Profile which can have a list of items When mapping to two tables and having an additional 'third' table in between, I was expecting to have to use the 'has' element from the objectbox documentation for each entity. Reading through the ObjectBox documentation, this is a bit different. Rather than having the has elements on each entity, as seen in the jpa mapping example, the has elements are placed in a group named 'associations'. This contains a single 'key' for each entity. These 'key' fields can be used to specify the position of the entity in the other entities. The drawback to this is that I'll have a bunch of many-to-many associations and I won't be able to specify a specific bi-directional relationship. ObjectBox documentation example: class User { String firstname String lastname String emailAddress SortedSet profiles = [] } class Profile { String username String password String emailAddress SortedSet items = [] } class UserProfile { String user = 'jdoe' String password String passwordConfirmation } To map this I could do the following: class User { String firstname String lastname String emailAddress SortedSet profiles = [] } class Profile { String username String password String emailAddress SortedSet items = [] } class UserProfile { String user = 'jdoe' String password String passwordConfirmation } or class User { String firstname String lastname String emailAddress SortedSet profiles = [] } class Profile { String username String password String emailAddress UserProfile association = [] } class UserProfile { String user = 'jdoe' String password String passwordConfirmation } Any guidance here would be useful. A: I found a working solution, but I'm curious to
