In May 2004 he chaired the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. As commissioner he recommended in November 2005 a merger between the mobile phone operators O2, T-Mobile and Orange. This recommendation was rejected by the Department of Trade and Industry, partly on the grounds that it was contrary to competition policy, and in June 2006 by the European Commission. In his report, he criticised the decision not to combine O2 and T-Mobile's GSM networks into one company, instead forcing the two companies to compete in separate markets with different equipment and for different tariffs. In the end, O2 was forced to sell its GSM operations to British Telecommunications. In May 2004, he chaired the Competition Appeal Board (CAB). In his interim report for the Public Services Committee in June 2005, he recommended the merger of the second and third largest postal operators Royal Mail and Parcel Post (now TNT Post) be challenged. In a report in 2007, Porter warned that unless businesses "got better at capturing and leveraging value" they would end up being "squeezed out by their more enterprising rivals and competitors and would become dependent on ever greater levels of funding." Porter said that the creation of "shareholder primacy" around major firms was creating shareholder value, and this value had the potential to fund the capture of "otherwise unt
