Cocaine is known to inhibit presynaptic dopamine transporters, dopa decarboxylase and norepinephrine transporter in the brain. These actions may be involved in cocaine's stimulant effects on the brain. Our preliminary data show that cocaine is ineffective in stimulating dopamine release in the nucleus accumbens of mutant mice lacking dopamine transporters (SERTa-/- mice). The authors hypothesized that these mice would be relatively resistant to cocaine-induced behavioral stimulation. In fact, SERTa-/- mice were found to show significantly greater acquisition of cocaine self-administration than wild-type mice. Our results reveal a surprising and important interaction between cocaine's inhibitory actions on dopamine transporters and its psychostimulant effects. The validity of this finding will depend on whether it is consistently reproduced. The experiments described in this study will provide important data on: 1) the mechanisms responsible for the self-administration of cocaine in SERTa-/- mice; 2) the relationship between dopamine transporter density and the behavioral response to cocaine; and 3) the relationship between dopamine transporter density and the therapeutic response to cocaine.// This Source Code Form is subject to the terms of the Mozilla Public License, v. 2.0. Google has added a feature to the Android app that lets you find wi-fi hotspots, based on the network's name, which brings wi-fi snooping to even more people. Until now, the most common way to find a hotspot was via the Settings app, but now it's an easy tap in most places. Now you can open Settings, tap Networks, and you'll see a new icon in the list of supported networks. Click it and it'll show you the available networks as a list of recently visited hotspots. We are wondering when Android will let you hide and/or clear the list of wi-fi networks in the menu bar, as it is possible to do on iPhone. Q: How to detect if user is running a headless daemon by user We're using chef to configure an auto-started daemon on our EC2 instances. How can we detect if the user that calls chef-client is running the daemon or not? The chef-client script puts all the right log files where they're needed by the daemon, but I need to make sure that it doesn't start if the user is not root. A: You need to use "run_list" and "tag_list" keys in chef. You can find a correct solution for your case here: In short you need a file on /etc/appname/init.d/ that will run the daemon on boot and then will parse user agent to see if daemon was called for it. There is no evidence so far that President Donald Trump's inner circle colluded with Russia in its effort to interfere with the U.S. election. Nunes, R-Calif., told ABC News Chief White House Correspondent Jonathan Karl during an interview Wednesday. Nunes, a former chairman of the House Intelligence Committee, made the remark at the end of a tense interview with Karl, in which the California congressman disputed the president's
