I am fascinated with how people use political terms in a way that seems so incongruous with the meaning of the words they use. "Consensus" is one such term, and it is certainly used in the context of politics, but in the context of the Bible, the idea of consensus is precisely the opposite of the idea of consensus (i.e. where everyone agrees to a particular doctrine). The concept of consensus in politics is used by people who believe that the goal is to ensure that there is as much agreement as possible. I am sure that we have all seen political polls, and probably agree with the idea that there is an inherent value in coming to consensus with others, because when everyone agrees on something, that thing will be more likely to be true than when some people decide to go against the consensus (even if they are wrong, which I don't think they are). We see this idea of consensus being used to enforce the doctrine of universal salvation. Many modernday evangelicals hold this belief, and they have been arguing this idea for so long that it has come to be accepted as normal. But, it is a false doctrine. Jesus said that the kingdom of God would be taken away from people who are afraid to admit that they need the gospel. He said this on the road to Damascus, so it is obvious that the idea of universal salvation is actually a violation of God's standard for salvation. The idea of consensus being used in politics is different from the idea of consensus being used in the Bible. The idea of consensus being used in the Bible is usually a sign that someone's doctrine has failed, and they have no alternative except to act in a way that appears to hold everyone else accountable (although it is possible that the act of consensus-making will allow some to stay behind to deny that they ever held a different viewpoint). I think that an example of the Bible's use of the idea of consensus would be in 2 Corinthians 13:5, when Paul says, "For we speak God's house in a human way." We have seen this idea used as an
