The following circuit is used in analog-to-digital converter. The resistor is used for the resistor divider. Why exactly does this circuit change the input, which is connected to the non-inverting input of the comparator? A: The input voltage causes all resistor dividers to be voltage divider networks. This means that the output of the voltage divider is dependent on the input voltage, and so is the output of the voltage divider network as a whole. Also, the output of the resistor divider is dependent on the input voltage and the voltage divider resistance ratio. The resistor will have a higher voltage at its midpoint when the circuit is operating than it would have otherwise, and this will be reflected in the comparator output. For example, with an input of 1V applied, with a resistors ratio of 10 the midpoint of the resistor divider will be 0.1V, whereas with the resistors ratio 10k/10k the midpoint voltage is 1V. When that voltage is compared against the comparator reference voltage, the comparator output will depend on the resistors ratio. If the resistors are 10k/10k, the comparator output will be 1, whereas if the resistors are 10k/100k the comparator output will be 0. This is why a reference resistor is normally required, so that the output voltage of the voltage divider is fixed regardless of the input voltage. For example if the voltage divider has 10k/10k resistors, then with a 0V input the midpoint is 0V, whereas a 1V input gives a midpoint of 1V. However, if a reference resistor 595f342e71
